History of the National Banking System

In our last article we outlined the banking system inaugurated by the National Banking Act of 1865 and pointed out a few of the benefits which it brought to the country. These were many. But the system was far from perfect. And its defects came to light every now and then first in 1873, then in 1893 and again in 1907—the three great crisis years. About once in twenty years there seems to come a time when the strength of the American financial and commercial fabric is tested, when men lose confidence in each other's solvency, when the weakest of the banks are weeded out and the less wisely planned business enterprises go to the wall. And these crises, as they are called show up the flaws in a country's banking system.

The National Banking Act of 1865 gave the United States a sound and uniform currency. But it failed to provide for variation in the amount of this currency to correspond to the variations in the demand for it. Banks issued more or less of their notes according as the price of U. S. bonds made it more or less profitable.

Now there are certain times of the year, notably in the fall, in crop moving time when the country needs more money, more of the medium by which products of the soil can be exchanged for manufactured goods and vice versa. At these times banks need ability to make loans and need ability to meet the increased demands made by depositors. And in crisis years they need this twice as much. Their resources may be double their liabilities, but they need some way to turn those resources into a medium of exchange which will circulate as money while the extraordinary demand lasts. When normal times return they don't need the money. It is a white elephant on their hands and a positive injury to the country. And for that reason a good banking system would provide an "elastic currency'', that is to say, one which will increase or decrease rapidly, as occasion requires. This the National Banking System utterly failed to provide. And this was why Congress, after the crisis of 1907, appointed the Aldrich or National Monetary Commission, and in 1908 passed the Aldrich Vreeland Act.
